The Marble Arch. This is a fine erection in the style of the Arch of Constantine at Rome. It was built by Nash at a cost of £75,000, and placed by George IV. at the entrance of Buckingham Palace but was removed to the north-east corner of Hyde Park in 1851. Just beyond it is the ancient district of Tyburn—Newgate's forerunner as a place of public execution. The central bronze gates of the Marble Arch, which are of admirable workmanship, are only opened for the Sovereign to pass through.
